Then they expelled me from the Party, because apparently I was not worthy of being a member, they threw me out of the Academy [Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences], well, so I went and pumped water. Not every company would employ people like me. There were special companies that could employ these apostates, these traitors, dissidents, for example we could clean windows, work in boiler rooms... And then there was also this company called Water Resources, whose employees drove around the Czech countryside in trailers and drilled wells, pumped water out of them and measured the flow. Then I was a private taxi driver, then I got a disability pension, after the Revolution I returned to the Institute for the History of Eastern Europe for a year and a half, but now I'm definitively retired.
